An Evening When Alone: Four Journals of Single Women in the South, 1827-67

Michael OBrien · Southern Texts Society

An Evening When Alone: Four Journals of Single Women in the South, 1827-67 is a compilation of four journals written by women who lived in the Southern United States during the antebellum period. These journals offer a unique perspective on the lives of single women during this time, providing insights into their daily lives, thoughts, and feelings. The women whose journals are included in the book were worlds apart, each living and writing in the South during the years 1827-67. The book highlights the courage and resilience of these women, who often faced significant challenges and limitations due to their single status. The journals provide a valuable resource for scholars and students of southern culture, offering a rich understanding of the personal and societal contexts of the time.