In the midst of the crisis of faith and reason, a distinguished group of scholars examines the relationship between faith and reason. They believe that faith and reason are not merely separate and independent, but are interconnected in a profound way. The book aims to serve as a testament of the authors' encyclopedic learning and faith in reason, or to find a reason for faith. The contributors focus on the interplay of faith and reason in various contexts, including the crisis of reason and of faith, the relationship between faith and science, and the role of reason in religious belief. The book covers topics such as revelation, faith, and reason, and provides a comprehensive exploration of the reasons for faith.
